

Response for Environmental Classes Topic

www.engagedenton.com

The City of Denton does offer educational classes in many of the topics that were posted in this EngageDenton question. Some examples are rain barrel making, home energy efficiency, and water efficiency just to name a few

We will currently be working on a better format to combine all the City Departments educational programs into one calendar to make it easier for the community to find. Due to currency City policy we cannot promote or advertise any classes or programs from private sources such as Agri life and several others that were mentioned in the post.

We have identified through your comments the need to offer courses and educational material via electronic options such as video and podcasts. We are currently talking about some ways to accomplish this in the future. We would like to thank everyone again for their comments and participation in this question.

The two most popular topics that were talked about were; rain water harvesting, and home energy reduction. Denton Parks and Recreation does offer a class in rain barrel making once a year. Until the new educational events calendar is created, keep a look out for that class coming this fall (held at Clear Creek Natural Heritage Center). The home energy reduction class that we held earlier this year can be held again if there is enough interest, but also the material from that class is posted online at the events page of www.sustainable Denton.com.
